

BONNETS OBSCURE "MAJOR ANDRE"

Headgear of Astonishing Size Diverts Attention in Clyde Fitch's Latest Shy at the Serious in Drama.

HISTORY PLAYS ITS PART.

Dream Picture of Heroine Makes Women Sob, and Subterranean Staircase Provides Other Fitch Surprise.

CLYDE FITCH BEFORE CURTAIN

"Major Andre," Clyde Fitch's latest play at the Lyric, is a mixture of headgear and history. We give headgear precedence, because in this play, seen at the Lyric last night, it rears itself high above history. We won't blame Mr.
Fitch for serving us a half-portion of history, because most of us got about all the history we could comfortably swallow at school—didn't you?

As for the head-dresses, Mr. Fitch deserves a silver-threads among-the-gold vote of thanks. This style of head-dress is so old that it is almost something new, and, as for those

ARTHUR BYRON AND CHRYSAL HERNE ON THE WONDERFUL TREE IN "MAJOR ANDRE." marvellous sky-scraping hats which the mischievous made and the good dames brought to Greater New York (smaller New York could hardly have held them), it was to laugh. It may be said that, or it may be said that, to say so, but those hats looked as if Mr. Fitch had designed them. They were wonders, and they will be more talked about, perhaps, than "Major Andre."

Were it not for a staircase leading up to the stage instead of up from the stage the head-dresses, with their accompanyment of bulging bustles and spreading, broadened skirts, might have been accepted as the expected Fitch
"surprise."

But Mr. Fitch started out cutting such a swath in the flooring of the stage with his subterranean staircase that the audience was disposed to vote it the big gibbon of novelty until the last act opened a new box of tricks.

Old-Fashioned Romance.

Then behold the living picture of romance in an old-fashioned, gilded frame.
By this time history had stepped in and virtually saved the situation. What had gone before rambled rather aimlessly and wobbled a bit on its historical legs. Andre was in love with Barbara Allen, who first thought she loved Nathan Goodrich, next imagined that Major Andre had captured her heart, and finally decided that she loved Goodrich after all—a shallow sweetheart played in shallow style by Chrysal Herne, who did little more than look pretty.

Miss Herne looked particularly well in a frame, when, on the eye of Andre's execution, Barbara's picture spoke to him in a vision.

The only shaft of light in the theatre was that which illumined the living picture, and when the condemned hero (whom Mr. Fitch made a soldier of misfortune instead of a spy), carried on a farewell conversation with the lady in the dream of a frame, there was a suspicious lot of sniffling among the women in the audience.

Ordinarily the serious is not Mr.
Fitch's best mood, but in this instance his play does not begin to take hold until it draws into the shadow of the gallows. The ending, like that of "Nathan Hale," is necessarily tragic, and leaves a sombre impression.

Arnold Daly's Work.

Arnold Daly, in the character of Major Andre's devoted Irish servant, did even more than Arthur Byron to make the closing scenes touching. His grief at the fate of his master was truly appealing, and in artistic contrast to the humor of his earlier characterization.

Mr. Byron played Major Andre with business-like celerity. Mr. Fitch, in a curtain speech, said lovely things about the new star, and at the end of the play Mr. Byron returned the compliment. Perhaps Mr. Byron deserved all that Mr. Fitch said, and perhaps he didn't. He was forceful and manly, but his work was almost entirely without shading.

Mrs. Hol Smith, expanded to circumstant dimensions in her revolutionary fig and Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, in somewhat lesser circumstances, were both capital as colonial dames, and Angela Keir, in a scream of a hat, was a funny flirt. Guy Bates Post gave a vivid place of acting when as Nathan Goodrich he found himself second choice in the affections of the fluctuating Barbara.

The play was staged with accurate, artistic detail. A woodland scene, more real than painted, was especially striking. The tree, however, in which Mr. Fitch hid his hero was wondrously good. No such tree ever grew before on or off the stage. Maybe it's a spy tree.

MAD CAREER OF DOG IS CHECKED

Just as a mad dog was about to spring upon May and Willie Knapp, the children of A. W. Knapp, of Stapleton, S. I., Policeman Dulkan fired two shots into the animal. The dog dropped dead at their feet.

All Stapleton was aroused to-day by the mad career of the dog, which ran down Canal street, frothing at the mouth. The policeman, assisted by several boys, drove the dog toward the home of his master, Mr. Knapp. May, four years old, and Willie, six years old, were standing in the doorway of their home at the time. Seeing them the animal made a straight line in their direction. Then the policeman drew his revolver and fired. The crowd which has been giving chase scattered in all directions.
